Introduction: We wanted to know about the UK practice in management of second trimester pregnancy loss. Hence we conducted the following survey concentrating when is the time for labour ward to take over the management. Objective: To determine at what gestational age second trimester loss is managed on the delivery suite in different hospitals throughout the UK. Methods: This was a telephone / postal survey. The midwife managers of 60 maternity units including nineteen university hospitals and forty one District General hospitals were contacted and asked: “From what gestational age would a second trimester loss be managed on their delivery suite”. Results: There was a 100% response to this survey. The gestational age ranged from 14-22 weeks. 45% of the hospitals manage from 20 weeks. 23.3% of the hospitals manage from 16 weeks 8.3% from 14 weeks and 8.3% from 22 weeks. Conclusion: Majority of the hospitals were managing 2nd trimester loss from 20 weeks. Majority of University Hospitals manage at 18 weeks whereas most of District General Hospitals manage from 20 weeks. Even though the number is small a statistically significant difference is noted between practice in University Hospitals and District General Hospitals.
