

Future contraception: what do women expect from hormonal contraception?
Christian Fiala, Austria

The introduction of hormonal contraception in the 1960s, was the fulfilment of one of humankind's dreams: the separation of sexuality and fertility. Women were able to control their fertility themselves and make their own choices concerning the number of children. Interestingly enough, women were left with regular artificially induced menstruation, even in the absence of ovulation under the pill.

This is an example of what women expect: choice. Not only when to have children or not, but also when to have menstruation or not.
