

Early rehabilitation needs to be focused on restitution not compensation

Data will be presented from both humans and animal models that show there is a unique time limited period early after stroke in which motor recovery at the level of impairment occurs. Rehabilitation techniques need to be developed that maximally-exploit this window of spontaneous biological recovery and enhanced responsiveness to training. Compensatory training should be avoided in this period and can be postponed until after the window has closed.